Reindeer people of Mongolia

'Reindeer boy' is what some people playfully call Munkh-Erdene, a happy 10-year-old from a family of reindeer herders. Munkh-Erdene lives in a region in north-western Mongolia only accessible by horseback or helicopter. In the morning, Munkh-Erdene awakes to the sound of water trickling over smooth river pebbles. He crawls out the door of his tepee which is made from branches and walks to the stream. Cupping his hands, he bends over and splashes the clear running water over his face. The place feels like a peaceful paradise, reflected in Munkh-Erdene's name which means 'eternal treasure'.

Munkh-Erdene's diet consists mainly of hunted meat, rice and flour. In the winter when the snow has frozen everything, his mother, Byambasurn, collects water by melting blocks of ice she has chopped from the frozen river.

Their herd of reindeer grazes on wild mushrooms, leaves from red and yellow shrubs and leaves from willow trees. The reindeer provide milk and cheese and carry the herders into the forest to hunt. But the reindeer population is shrinking and the wildlife in the forests is disappearing. A family needs at least 100 reindeer to sustain their livelihood. At the moment, families only have an average of 14 reindeer. Many of the reindeer people, also known as the Tsaatan people, have given up hope and abandoned their lifestyle, which dates back to China's Tang dynasty.

Munkh-Erdene doesn't think about his family's hardships. He is helpful around the tepee, cleaning, chopping firewood and milking the reindeer. When the snow has melted, he likes to ride a reindeer while it is trotting. He enjoys chasing the reindeer and trying to catch them.

opal colours swish
wash together.
Your window to the world and hear the beat of jungle secrets

that you never forget.

Undercover agent

Alex is a young spy who has sneaked aboard a plane carrying two men working for Blue, her arch-enemy. The plane is heading into the Amazon jungle.

Alex looked out the open exit of the small twin-engine plane as it swooped above the dense treetops of the Amazon jungle. The thick canopy of green hurtled beneath them like an enormous ocean, each treetop another wave in a vast flurry that seemed to last forever. They were flying so close Alex was sure that if she ran a hand along the leaves, she could have scooped up the dew that was sprinkled over the jungle like a giant handful of liquid gold. She fixed her eyes on the landscape below and thought to herself, whoever was responsible for making the world was showing off when they made this part.

Suddenly the plane lurched sideways as it struck a pocket of turbulence. Alex's head hit the cold metal wall with a thud as the giant of a man who was in charge of the mission launched another tirade against the pilot.

'Where'd you get your licence from? The back of a cereal box? My three-year-old nephew could fly this plane better than you. I've heard they've trained chimps that could outdo your aviation skills.'

Alex was impressed. She'd been dealing with Blue's thugs for years and 'aviation' was the longest word she'd ever heard from any of them.

The pilot's face remained unchanged. He'd heard all about this guy from the other pilots and had already filled his ears with cottonwool so that none of his cursing could filter through.

The suited tough adjusted his seatbelt tighter around his waist before pulling out a floral handkerchief and wiping his brow. The short, fat guy sitting next to him stared.

'Floral?' he smirked.

'It was a present from my daughter.' The tough guy said it like a warning, his nerves making him more edgy than usual.

He'd been nervous since the trip began and if Alex's guess was right, the pilot was as skilled as they came and was getting great pleasure out of the occasional and 'unexpected' turbulence the plane was experiencing.

Just then, the short, fat guy buried his head in his lap and filled another sick bag with vomit. Alex thought she saw the faintest of grins on the pilot's face.

She adjusted the miniature parachute on her back and crawled across the metal floor of the cargo plane between wooden crates that were stacked like bowling pins. Taking out her laser knife, she carefully broke the reinforced seals on a few of the crates before she found it. A small humidifier case that, if she was right, was packed with exactly what she was looking for and it was her job to get her hands on it before the case reached Blue.

Book reviews

Polar Boy by Sandy Fussell

Iluak is afraid of what lurks behind the snow banks and sniffs around the igloo. He's afraid of bears. His Nana has told him that a bear is waiting for him. One day he must face it, thereby saving his people. However, even in the land of snow, ice and constant whiteness, life has a way of surprising a person. To win the day, Iluak will have to be as brave as his father and as wise as his Nana.

Fussell draws us into Iluak's world with exquisite description, characters we can identify with and a story with universal appeal. Iluak desperately wants to be brave. He doesn't realise that bravery isn't living without fear; it's living in spite of it.

The Secret Ministry of Frost by Nick Lake

Light lives on her father's huge estate while he does scientific research in remote corners of the world. Her mother died when she was very young. Now her father has disappeared and she must venture into the perilous cold of the Arctic Circle to find him. With the aid of a strange creature that has stepped straight out of Inuit legend and Butler, a family servant who is more than he first appears, she fights bravely against an enemy who is determined to freeze the whole world. Driven by her love for her father, to the point of being willing to sacrifice everything, Light refuses to be thwarted by the violent, cruel beings that serve Mr Frost.

Lake has cleverly woven Inuit legends into his beautifully crafted fantasy in such a way that it all seems utterly feasible. His text sings with the crispness of permafrost and the clarity of an Arctic sky.

THE TOURNAMENT

Kay, foster-brother of the legendary King Arthur, tests his might in a tournament against an unknown knight.

Kay was anxious to win his spurs, so all day he fought like a man inspired. Towards the end of the tournament his sword arm was weary and his armour showed several fearful rents, but he was still undefeated. Only one other knight could say the same. This was an unknown knight, whose shield bore no crest. Kay did not recognise his horse or his armour. It occurred to him that this might be a spy sent by Pellenore or Mark of Cornwall; he resolved to challenge the Unknown in the last round of the tournament and unmask him.

The Unknown would not put up his visor to answer Kay's challenge. His voice was muffled and soft as he replied:

'I have waited all day to fight with you, Kay, brother of Arthur, for I think you are an opponent worthy of my steel.' With these words the Unknown spurred his horse and galloped forward. Kay galloped towards the Unknown at full speed, but although he dealt the Unknown a mighty blow with his lance, which would have rocked a lesser man in the saddle, his new opponent scarcely seemed to feel it.

Kay's second charge was even more unsuccessful, for the Unknown's lance penetrated one of the rents in his armour and pierced his leg. The pain made Kay faint and dizzy, but he set his teeth and aimed a blow wildly back at his enemy. At the third charge Kay could no longer survive the savage onslaught, and at the impact of the Unknown's fierce blows, he tottered in the saddle and tumbled heavily to the ground.

A groan went up from the crowd, for Kay was popular, and nothing was known about the stranger. Arthur himself hated to see his foster-brother bite the dust at the hand of an anonymous knight. But he had a duty to fulfil. He faced the Unknown graciously and asked him to put up his visor.

The face which confronted him belonged to no spy from Leodegrance or Pellenore. He was a young and dazzlingly handsome man, scarcely older than himself, who smiled frankly at the king.

Teachers can be replaced by computers

The case for

With the fast pace of technological development, it will not be surprising if the classroom teacher is soon replaced by a computer. Children are so much more adept at using all forms of gaming and digital technology than adults. They will be more ready and enthusiastic to learn if they are given a high-speed internet connection and a screen than if they are made to sit behind a desk, facing the blackboard all day. The internet has become such a pervasive tool that students no longer need to have a teacher act as the fountain of knowledge—with the click of a mouse they can look up all the facts they need.

Indeed, with wikis and web portals, children don't even need to turn up to class. Virtual spaces can replace the classroom and online forums can replace class discussions. While learning in an online environment, children can also practise web etiquette and online safety skills which are vital in the twenty-first century.

With workplaces and the rest of the real world becoming increasingly computer-reliant, the old-fashioned classroom with a chalk-wielding teacher no longer seems relevant.

Ms Megabyte

The case against

Unless we want to create a generation of robots, the positive interactions between teachers and their students can never be replaced by a computer. At the centre of a classroom, striving to bring out the potential of every student and guiding all the children's academic and emotional development, is the teacher. Children need encouragement to excel as well as support when they face difficulties, both of which a computer could never provide.

No virtual space can replace the social interactions with friends that occur in a classroom and playground. Going on a real excursion to the zoo surely beats going on a virtual tour.

The internet may be an extremely powerful tool enabling children to engage in research and learning, but children need to be taught how to use this tool by an experienced teacher. A teacher can help children to sort fact from fiction and make judgements about what they read on the internet. Teachers also ensure that children interact safely with others online.

Let's not abandon our children to machines. They need the commitment and guidance that only a teacher can provide.

Mr Mentor

36. The word 'adept' means
- (A) skilful.
 - (B) reliable.
 - (C) creative.
 - (D) qualified.
37. According to Ms Megabyte, children will be more keen to learn if
- (A) the internet is provided for free.
 - (B) blackboards are no longer used.
 - (C) teachers have better technology skills.
 - (D) they are given a computer with a fast internet connection.
38. Ms Megabyte argues that the internet can help children in their learning by
- (A) monitoring them closely.
 - (B) accelerating their reading progress.
 - (C) providing all the information that they need.
 - (D) allowing more physical space for classroom discussions.
39. What is Ms Megabyte's opinion about how children learn web etiquette and online safety?
- (A) Children learn by doing.
 - (B) Children learn through research.
 - (C) Instruction from a teacher is required.
 - (D) Online forums offer adequate guidance.

42. In the text, the phrase 'At the centre of a classroom' refers to
- (A) the robots.
 - (B) the teacher.

The passage of time

The passageway climbed and fell, twisted back on itself, opened into a little antechamber, then narrowed again into a mere crack that Hannah could barely squeeze through. Beyond was another long, crooked, narrow passageway that led them down in a series of rough steps and falls, back to the cave they had first entered. Weary, disappointed and baffled, Hannah stumbled out onto the hillside, her friends trailing along behind her. Her candle blew out, and they were left shivering in the moonlit darkness.

‘Did it just go in a big circle?’ Scarlett asked. ‘Or did we go the wrong way somehow?’

‘Should we go through again?’ Max said. ‘Maybe we took a wrong turn.’

‘I don’t think we did,’ Donovan said in a low voice. ‘Look!’

They all turned and looked out over the valley.

The loch* gleamed silver under the moon, with the familiar black shapes of islands floating like scattered lumps of ebon. They could see the snowy peak of Ben Lomond and the distant lines of hills to the west, just as they had seen them a thousand times before.

What was different was Wintersloe. There was no house with mismatching turrets and crow-stepped gables, no garden laid out in knots of green hedges. Where the ruin normally lay was a tall, grim castle of stone, with narrow slits instead of windows and a moat of dark, gleaming water.

‘We did it,’ Hannah breathed. ‘I can’t believe it.’

A sudden gust of excitement overtook the four friends and they danced and capered about madly, their packs banging on their backs. Just as suddenly, sobriety crashed down upon them. What had they done?

In that moment, all four realised that they had not truly believed it was possible to travel back in time. The whole notion had been a game they had been playing, pretending that they believed but all the time knowing it was just make-believe. Now, though, now they knew it was not a game. The four of them had left their own lives and their own time behind them, and come into a world that was played by far different rules. They could easily die here, or be trapped, unable to find their way home again. It was a terrifying thought, and one they all flinched from.
