The wonder wombat

At one o'clock, Zachariah was finally allowed to put on his costume. He pulled on some brown track-suit pants and a brown T-shirt with a picture of a wombat on it. For his feet there were brown furry slippers.

He looked at his homemade mask and cardboard ears and hoped that they looked a bit like a wombat. The last thing he had to put on was a cloak which his mother had made out of an old blue table-cloth. On the back was a huge letter 'W' painted in bright yellow.

When he was ready, he stretched out his arms straight ahead of him and ran to the lounge to show his parents. He zoomed once around the room before his dad scooped him up and stood him on a chair.

'Look! Up on the chair! Is it a bird? Is it a plane?'

Zachariah's mother answered, 'No, it's the Wonder Wombat!'

Zachariah got down from the chair and took off his mask. He was feeling a bit sulky. 'I'd still rather have a real wombat than pretend to be one,' he grumbled.

His parents looked at each other. His dad patted the spare seat on the couch and said, 'Come over here, Wonder Zach. We've got some good news for you.' He nudged his wife. 'You tell him, Tess.'

As Zachariah sat down, his mother put her arm around him and said, 'When you get home from the party, there'll be a surprise waiting for you. Your dad's going out soon and he'll bring it back with him.'

Zachariah immediately began bouncing up and down on the seat, yelling 'Oh boy, oh boy! I can't wait!' Then he stopped long enough to ask, 'What is it? Is it a pet? A wombat? It is, isn't it?'

But his dad only winked at him and said, 'I guess you'll just have to wait and see, kiddo. By the way, bring the Birthday Girl with you—I think she'll want to see your surprise.'

Zachariah jumped up. 'Can I go over and tell Becky now? She asked me to get there before the other kids.'

'Well, it won't take you long to walk all the way next door,' said his mum. 'But I think you're forgetting something.'

'What?'

'The birthday present.'

'Whoops, sorry.' He picked up a parcel from the coffee table and kissed his mum. She straightened his cardboard ears.

'Now don't forget to say thank you to Becky's mother and be careful not to trip on your cape,' she said.

'Have a good time, WW,' said his dad, 'and don't fly too high or you might crash into a jumbo jet.'

How to build a castle

Castle in Guédelon in 2005

Castle in Guédelon in 2015

In 1979 a man named Michel Guyot, who lives in the Yonne district of Burgundy in France, decided he wanted to build a castle from scratch. Like many of us, he was curious to know how castles were built. He chose to build a thirteenth-century-style castle on an abandoned quarry site near his home in the Guédelon forest.

In 1997 a group of fifty people began the enormous task of bringing this castle to life. But it wasn't just a matter of having the right architectural plans and the workers to carry them out; Monsieur Guyot wanted this castle to be as authentic as possible, so he decided it would be built using only the tools and the building methods employed in the Middle Ages. Monsieur Guyot estimated construction would take around twenty-five years to complete. And that means that this castle is still being built and won't be finished until 2022!

Work has already been underway for over twenty years, and walking through the site you see the workers using their hands, not electric tools, to build this masterpiece. In keeping with authentic ancient practices, they create pulleys* to hoist the stone up to the level on which they are working; they use hand-forged chisels to shape the timber beams, and they use their own bodies to form a human chain to carry great clumps of earth up handmade stairs to form the floor of the Great Hall. Inside, the castle walls are rendered with lime to create a weatherproof seal. Lime plaster is applied to provide a smooth surface and then the walls are lime washed. Finally they are decorated with line drawings and then painted with colourful murals using natural dyes. The floors are paved with kiln-fired paving tiles and the carpenters and the blacksmiths are busy making the doors.

Outside, beyond the castle and the workers' sheds, is a thirteenth-century farm where a flock of sheep wanders about, oblivious to hundreds of curious visitors. Chickens squawk and scatter, and pigs slosh about in mud. And cattle and horses are kept secure behind handmade fences.

The scene is like something out of the Middle Ages.

But then, that's the point ... isn't it?

Capture the flag

I was the first to stop running. I had to stop. My lungs felt ready to explode; burning with every breath I took. Bent forward, head down, hands on my knees, I tried to focus on slowing my breathing and calming down. Then Maudie and Jacob were there, red-faced and breathing hard. We looked at each other and then back at the way we'd come. There was no one in sight; that had to be a good thing.

After all the planning and conniving we'd done to get to this point, I was pretty confident no one would ever guess which route we'd taken.

'We'd better not stop here,' said Maudie, her voice quiet but resolute. 'We're too close and it's too open. We'll stop for a bit when we get to the river, ok? Think things through.'

We looked at each other before nodding in silent agreement.

We walked three abreast now, like equals, with steady, measured steps. No one spoke. I, for one, was glad of the silence. I was still trying to come to terms with what we had done and getting it all straight in my head.

I glanced to my right and then my left. Maudie's serious face lit up momentarily as she flashed me a quick, reassuring smile. Her face was grimed with dirt and dust but she looked strong. Jacob was on autopilot, his face not giving anything away. His little feet in their well-worn boots marched on, uncomplaining. Brave, now that I thought of it; they both were.

Reaching the top of a long incline, we all stopped and turned as if by arrangement. Far off in the distance, the school, cars and ant-sized people in the village spread out like a half-played, abandoned board game. Not too far from the truth, I thought, and found myself grinning. As we watched, a trio of tiny, red-clad figures broke away from the slow monotony of the scene. They were too far away to be individually recognisable but I had a fair inkling who they were. I wondered whether a quick glance upwards on their part might be enough to give us away but then almost laughed at the thought. We'd left nothing to chance this time and there was no way that the Greens were going to lose again.

We turned as one and resumed walking but something had changed. Something had shifted in our collective mood. No longer the underdog, every step we took seemed to lighten and energise us, buoying us up in anticipation of the victory that lay ahead.

Ratcatchers

Ever since the Great Plague of 1665, people in the Western world have viewed rats with contempt and horror. These rodents not only spread disease, but also eat human food and kill other animals. Rats have even stowed away on ships and colonised new lands. This often means ecological disaster for insects and ground-dwelling or nesting birds. Nowhere is this more evident than on islands. Due to their isolation, a high proportion of island species are endemic (found nowhere else). While islands make up only 5% of Earth's landmass, they are home to 20% of the world's mammal, reptile and bird species. Unfortunately, about 75% of animal extinctions since 1600 have occurred on islands. The main culprits are introduced rats. In recent years, there has been a growing movement to rid islands of rats and other introduced animals to give the threatened native species a fighting chance. This is known as island restoration.

The formula for island restoration is simple: eliminate introduced species and then reintroduce native species, if they are not already extinct. New Zealand is the world's expert in island restoration and has cleared rats from more than 40 islands since the 1960s. Today, about 800 islands around the world are rodent-free. On most islands, populations of native animal species have rebounded. Eight countries (New Zealand, Australia, the UK, the USA, France, Mexico, Ecuador and the Seychelles) account for more than 80% of island restoration.

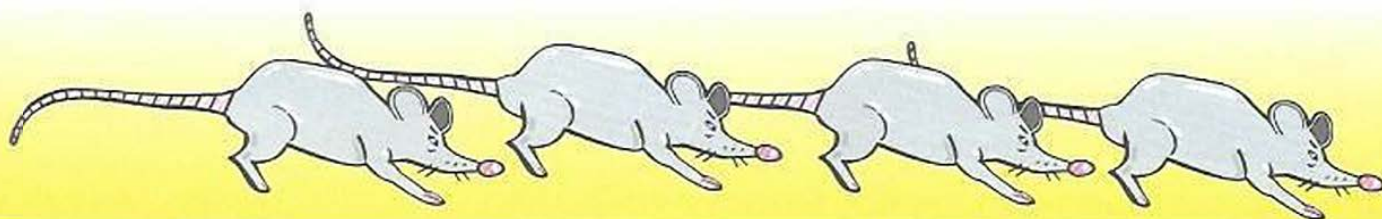

In 2015 an international 'Rat team' eradicated rats from remote South Georgia Island, near Antarctica, at great expense using a ship, three helicopters and 100 tonnes of rat poison. South Georgia is the largest island restoration project ever undertaken. The government of South Georgia gave the project the green light because rats had exterminated 90% of the seabirds on the island and melting glaciers were giving them access to the remaining seabird colonies.

Despite its successes, island restoration has its critics. Animal-rights activists protest against killing animals to solve a problem that humans caused in the first place. They accuse those involved of prioritising some species over others.

Other critics point to the huge expense of eradication programs. Sea and aerial transport costs to faraway islands are high. In addition, many islands have inaccessible places, such as steep mountains, where rodents can hide. Pesticides are also expensive and so are the trained rodent detector dogs and their handlers that are often required for complete success. The large costs involved in making islands rodent-free cannot be avoided. But would this money be more effectively spent on other conservation programs?

Another valid criticism comes from the unknown consequences of the large-scale use of rat poison. In some projects in the past, untargeted species such as native rodents and land crabs were poisoned. Secondary poisoning has also been recorded on the Aleutian Islands where bald eagles and other birds ate poisoned rats.

Regardless of your viewpoint, island restoration is selective killing of some species for the sake of saving others. However, when weighed up against the possibility of imminent extinction for many endemic island species, could it be considered the lesser of two evils?

Margaret Murry

It was a dark and stormy night in a small village in the United States.

In her attic bedroom, Margaret Murry, wrapped in an old patchwork quilt, sat on the foot of her bed and watched the trees tossing in the frenzied lashing of the wind. Behind the trees clouds scudded frantically across the sky. Every few moments the moon ripped through them, creating wraith-like shadows that raced along the ground.

The house shook.

Wrapped in her quilt, Meg shook.

She wasn't usually afraid of weather. It's not just the weather, she thought. It's the weather on top of everything else. On top of me. On top of Meg Murry doing everything wrong.

School. School was all wrong. She'd been dropped down to the lowest section in her grade. That morning one of her teachers had said crossly, 'Really, Meg, I don't understand how a child with parents as brilliant as yours are supposed to be can be such a poor student. If you don't manage to do a little better you'll have to stay back next year.'

During lunch she'd fooled around a little to try to make herself feel better, and one of the girls said scornfully, 'After all, Meg, we aren't babies any more. Why do you always act like one?'

And on the way home from school, walking up the road with her arms full of books, one of the boys had said something about her 'dumb baby brother'. At this she'd thrown the books on the side of the road and tackled him with every ounce of strength she had, and arrived home with her blouse torn and a big bruise under one eye.

Sandy and Dennys, her ten-year-old twin brothers, who got home from school an hour earlier than she did, were disgusted. 'Let us do the fighting when it's necessary,' they told her.

Genghis Khan

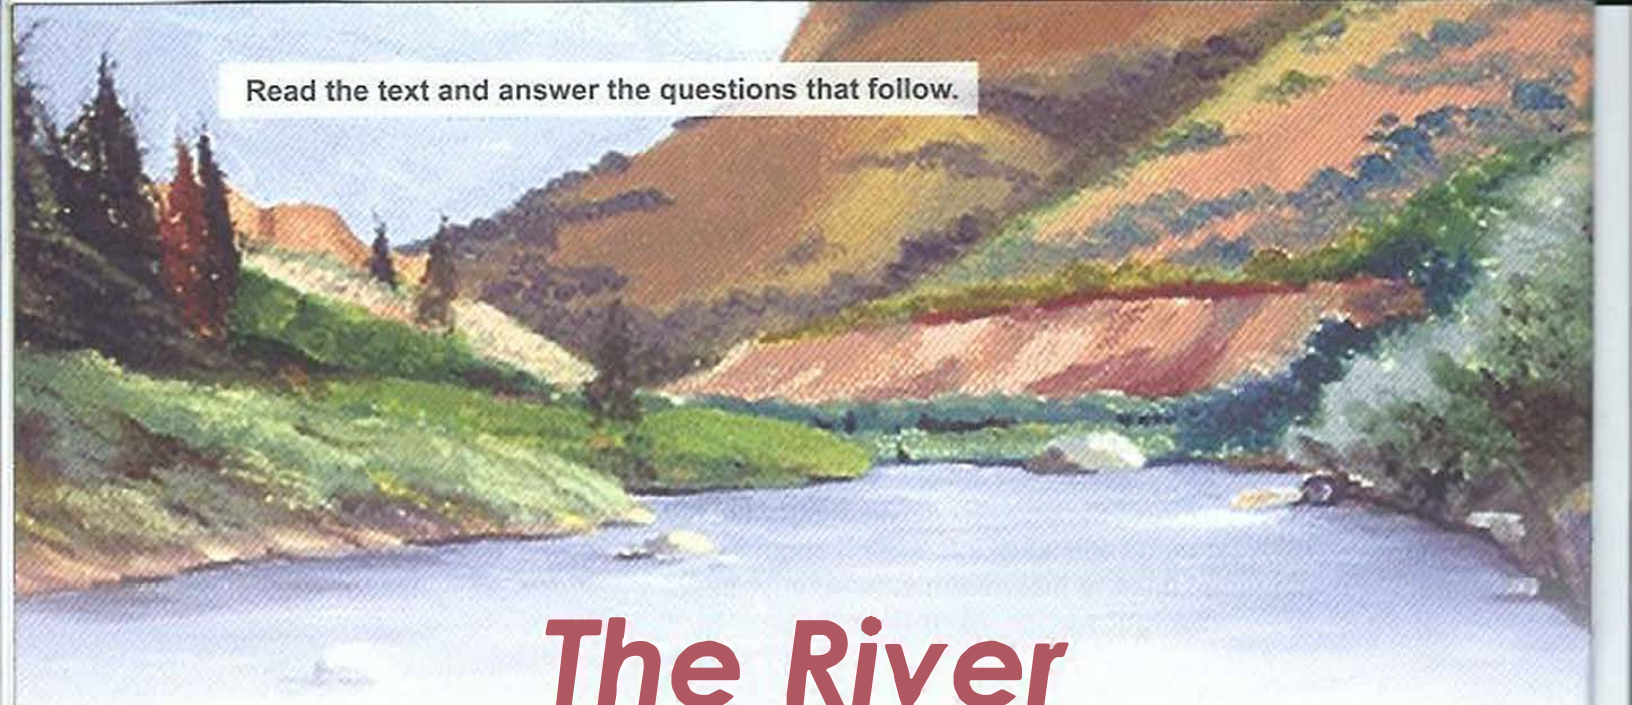

Genghis Khan was the founder and Great Khan of the Mongol Empire, an empire that eventually covered a huge area between modern day Korea and Hungary. In the 12th century, Mongolia was a land populated by nomads and farmers who were often involved in violent raids over access to water and grazing land. Genghis united these many different clans into one nation under a single flag and went on to build the Mongol Empire.

Genghis was born about 1155 near the Khentii Mountains in what is now north central Mongolia. A birthmark on his hand meant, according to Mongol folklore, that he was destined to become a great warrior and leader. From an early age his mother, Hoelun, taught him about the harsh reality of living in Mongol tribal society and the need to forge links with other clans. As a nine year old, Genghis experienced these harsh realities when his father was poisoned during a meal with a rival tribe. Cruelly, the young, fatherless Genghis and his family were also expelled by their own clan and left to fend for themselves. The family survived by eating roots, rodents and fish. Perhaps these early childhood experiences contributed to Genghis Khan's extraordinary leadership skills or, maybe, he was born to lead.

Although Genghis is famed for his ability to unite people, he is infamous for his ruthlessness towards any tribe who resisted his plans. Genghis led a ferocious army of warriors and implemented military strategies that are still respected today. One strategy (also used hundreds of years later by the French general Napoleon Bonaparte) was 'divide and conquer'. This strategy involved cutting off lines of communication and separating sections of the enemy army to make them feel alone and unprotected.

In contrast to Genghis Khan's fame in life, his burial is shrouded in mystery. The cause of his death in 1227 is known—an infected wound caused by an arrow—but the exact location of his grave has never been identified. It is believed that his burial site is near his birthplace in the Khentii Aimag region, somewhere close to the Onon River. Although modern technology may eventually locate the burial place, there is strong feeling among the Mongolian people that this would be a violation of Genghis Khan's final request that he be buried in an unmarked grave.

The River

The river flows past poplars and willows and brambles, muttering unceasingly to itself, oblivious to the hawk that lazes overhead and the plovers wittering through the grass. On the banks sheep doze, trot and prop, or gaze at nothing, lost in their sheep-thoughts. Woolgathering.

The river speaks, the ripples and eddies notations of its voice. Light spills along the surface, pleating, folding, revealing twisting currents that curl over stones and weed. Wind combs the trees, ruffles their reflections. It cools Marc's face and hands, runs its chilling fingers through his hair. And all the while the river speaks to him.

Each day he passes by lush fields where the long-horned cattle, shaggy and curious, tear up the grass, snorting through their soft wet nostrils. This evening, when the trout begin to feed, he'll bring his fishing rod. Maybe he'll catch a decent one to take back home.

He knows his family isn't doing well. His father has been forced to sell off land to the neighbour, a city chap looking for a place with river frontage. Marc's two sisters sometimes work in the big house, which Marc has only seen from the outside. The neighbour's garage is as big as the house where Marc lives.

When Marc arrives home, the table is laid for lunch. He can smell chops—burnt bone and melted fat—and hear the potatoes boiling starchily in a dented pot.

'Baked beans?' his mother asks. He nods. 'Mind you slice the bread nice and thin,' she reminds him, handing over the serrated knife. Butter softens in a saucer.

'I'm going out later.'

'You can't go fishing, not this evening. Your father wants to talk to you.'

Marc feels a tightness in his jaw. The night before, through the thin walls separating the two bedrooms, he'd heard disconnected words and phrases: 'price', 'offer', 'not too late', 'able to adjust'. He'd rolled over, pulling the pillow close around his ears, the blood throbbing in his head.

It is now the hour before dusk and the river is alive with insects. He can see his mother hunched over in the vegetable garden tearing out weeds, the chickens nodding around her as they search for food. His father must still be in the shed, where he's trying to fix the tractor. Grabbing his rod, Marc quietly pulls the screen door closed behind him. As he glances back, the windows are reflecting the sinking sun. It's as if the inside of the house is ablaze. Marc turns his back on its brilliance and runs towards the river's chant.
