Malaria is a disease that kills half a million humans anually in tropical regions. It is transmitted via mosquitoes that are infected with malaria parasites. Children who are younger than five are tipically most at risk.

The symptoms of malaria are similar to those caused by the influenza virus. Malaria is easily diagnosed and cured, but prevention is the simplest strategy. People who might be exposed are encouraged to sleep beneath nets soaked with insectacide.
When a mosquito touches the protective barrier, it is immediately killed.

Alarmingly, the malaria parasite is developing resistance to current antimalarial drugs that are used to treat it. Scientists and health officials are now desperatly working on a remedy. The recent discovery that specific groups of people in Africa and Asia are naturally immune has generated much excitement. Researchers hope to exploit this and create a vacsine that will eliminate this infection forever.
