The beach is usually a relaxing and idillic place. However, whether you enjoy strenuous exercise or leisurely lounging on a towell, safety must always be the priority. Lifeguards constantly urge swimmers to swim in the designated area marked by the flags. These attendants studeously watch for any unexpected danger. Contrary to popular opinion, the most threatening things are not sharks or jellyfish, but rip currants or 'rips'.

Rips are fast flowing 'rivers' of water that funnel offshore though specific channels that continually change position. Multiple factors determine their formation including the whether, the shape of the coastline and the nature of the breaking waves. Rips are unpredictable.
They can develop quickly and transport unsuspecting swimmers far out to sea. People get exhausted from struggling in vain against rips and may become panickey. The best advice is to remain calm, swim slowly parallel to the beach and signal for assistance.
